Correlates of cannabis use and chronic cannabis users' clinical characteristics.

This research focuses on the effects of cannabis use (determined by self-report) and clinical conditions on psychiatric illness in adult chronic cannabis users. A secondary purpose of this research is to examine whether cannabis use and clinical variables contribute to the variance in psychiatric symptomology of the chronic cannabis users studied. One hundred twenty-six adults (50 men, 76 women) were randomly selected from the community and completed questionnaires that inquired into social, psychological, demographic, medical, and substance use variables. In addition, two interviewers administered the MINI, the Prosocial Scale, and a substance use questionnaire. Results from the logistic regression analysis indicated a significant relationship between number of years of cannabis use and psychiatric morbidity. This relationship did not appear to be explained by depressive symptoms, lifetime major depression, or cannabis-induced psychotic symptoms. This article discusses the relationship between cannabis use and psychopathology in detail as well as the effects of demographic and substance use variables on cannabis use and psychiatric morbidity. Contrary to what one might expect from "The New Song by Mr. Porter," which sees Mimi on the receiving end of more of the man's unwanted advances, in the end she may not be as insignificant as it may appear from the outset of a tune that seems destined to be the anthemic mantra of the nouveau ballroom set. With choruses that rise from subsoil to solé, "No String along with" is notably impressionistic, albeit effervescently so, as the vocal performance is decept

Today, communications networks are so large and complex that they are virtually impossible to manage. Networking software typically deploys remote management to simplify managing large networks. One of the most important elements for managing an organization's network is a router. A router is a complex device that translates an internet protocol (IP) address into a specific hardware address that is more applicable to a local computer. In many organizations, an IP address is used to identify a specific IP device rather than a particular machine. Routers communicate with other routers using the Transmission Control Protocol (TCP)/Internet Protocol (IP) on networks such as the Internet. Network devices are configured and managed by using a combination of software and hardware. Typically, a user connects to a host via a network. The host is connected to a physical network device to transmit and receive information. Therefore, to control a device, the user needs to be able to control the host. There are several existing technologies to control and monitor hosts. Some of these technologies use device configuration parameters (like IP address and port number) to control and monitor the device. This type of information is sufficient to control and monitor a device in a very crude and simplistic manner. Other existing technologies can be used to remotely control and monitor a device's state or status. For example, the Remote Network Monitoring feature that is available in WINDOWS® Server 2003 as part of the Windows® 648931e174
